Fig off. O beautiful bird,
To the kome of the mourned and dear;
And whisper each tender word,
And tell of each heart-wring tear.

And sing her a song so sweet. The sweetest that memory sing-; And never rest on your feet, Nor pause on your mounting wings-

But onward and upward speed.

Through the regions dim and grand, Till the far-off stars shall lend Your course to the spirit-land. There, bowered in pleasant groves, Where the souls of the blessed dwell, The phantom presence roves, Of the maiden we love so well.

You will know her by her eyes, That are dark as the forest fawn's; By their glauce of glad surprise. And their light like the morning dawn's. You will know her by the grace Of her motious, wild and free; By her eloquent, child-like face, And her form like the swaying tree

Then hie to her gentle breast, And closely nestle there; Ah, happy! to be carest By an angel so pure and fair. She will take every foud embrace, Each kiss we have warmly given. And sigh for her dear untive place, Though she blooms mid the roses of heaven
